

Liberating Leadership – unlocking your groups' potential

We all have a part to play in building the Big Society

This practical course will help them identify, develop and support their group's potential. They'll learn how to capitalise on people's skills, enthusiasm and potential through a new approach to leadership, and they'll leave having learnt practical activities that they can use in their group.

Sceptical about leadership?

You're not alone. People in the voluntary sector have tended to see leadership as being irrelevant to groups - they believe it's about individuals with particular characteristics, and certain positions and specific responsibilities in their group.

In fact, quite the opposite is true. Leadership is more about processes, roles and actions - which many of people involved in voluntary groups are probably already carrying out.

Learning about leadership can help you to understand how your group functions, reveal any areas that could be developed, and take action with others to make a difference in your group.

Topics for the training include:

- What leadership is and why this approach is different
- The essential elements of leadership
- How to apply leadership principles
- How to identify and use roles
- Making connections beyond your organisation
- Strengthening yourself and your skills

How can this training help your group?

The training day - along with the supporting materials and activities - will help you learn how to:

- recognise and develop your skills, talents, abilities and experience, and address any gaps;
- spread roles and responsibilities more fairly;
- improve the way you work together and help solve some of the problems you face;
- help you to achieve more and make better use of your time;
- inspire and motivate each other, and others outside the group;
- improve the impact and influence you have.
